

ful to be Int very well.”
ake an inter-Euchee and ive American
in Texas, her e picked up
Oklahoma.
en me more
she says. “It
very personal
and applied

Jerilyn Free-Euchee and
ny of whom ustoms. She stions about
about other

ngs I wanted
d art,” Free-

ngest person
ican studies
as attempted
reek heritage
it as a child.
live so that it
people about
rning a career

ree compo-
lopment and

of Arts in lib-
ies emphasis,
d within the
te of Arts de-
international
n humanities
lans.
ct of the NAS
t component
n by the Na-
ce, including
e at the West Global Fest at sting the Red
estival at the

also serves the
ive American
by providing
am about Na-
h educational
r-in-residence
Woods says.

NSU's recent initiatives are targeted at teaching young people more about the Cherokee culture and, specifically, its language. The product of a joint agreement between the Cherokee Nation and the university, NSU's Cherokee language degree program was launched in fall 2005 in response to a U.S. Administration of Native Americans survey grant.

Through the survey, the Cherokee Nation assessed the state of the Cherokee language in northeastern Oklahoma, says Wyman Kirk, NSU associate professor of Cherokee.

“We knew the language had been getting weaker and was facing a serious loss of speakers,” he says. “The survey found that most Cherokee speakers are 40 or older. Very few young people know and use the language, and if they do, it's isolated to only specific families.”

Fortunately, the survey also found that many Cherokees are eager to learn or relearn their native language. The Cherokee Nation responded by outlining plans for a Cherokee immersion school in Tahlequah, modeled after a Hawaiian immersion program. NSU's Cherokee language program was designed, in part, to train teachers for the school.

Although the Cherokee language has several thousand fluent speakers, the International Wordpath Society, a Native American language preservation organization, estimates that one-third of Oklahoma's Native languages are already extinct.

“We are very blessed to have so many speakers today, but if nothing is done to retain the language, it will go by the wayside,” NSU's Oosahwee says. “With the language will go the life ways of the Cherokee people.”

Other state universities have similar programs with the purpose of revitalizing Native American languages and culture. The University of Oklahoma's Native American studies program includes courses in history, tribal economics, philosophy and several languages. Oklahoma State University offers an American Indian studies minor.

Woods says anyone, no matter his or her heritage, can appreciate the material taught in Native American studies courses. He says he hopes that interest in Native cultures and languages will continue to grow in Tulsa and the surrounding areas.

“It's important that Native Americans recognize their cultures are as worthy of study as European, Asian or American cultures,” he says. “For non-Natives, learning about another culture helps teach respect and tolerance. It promotes understanding.” ■

“Good Morning America” Visits OSU-Tulsa

OSU-Tulsa student Cindy Downes was featured on ABC's "Good Morning America" for her ambitious return to college. Cindy put her college career on hold to raise a family. Now, she's working on a degree through the Tulsa Community College/OSU-Tulsa partnership.

It's never too late to realize a dream of earning a college degree. Just ask Cindy, who now begins her days saying, "Good morning, OSU." To learn more, visit www.osu-tulsa.okstate.edu or call 918-594-8000.

Read TulsaPeople anywhere, at anytime www.tulsapeoplemagazine.com

VOICES FROM THE HEARTLAND

A THOUGHT PROVOKING COLLECTION OF ESSAYS ON LIFE AND LIVING BY OKLAHOMA WOMEN

FEATURING 50 CONTRIBUTORS INCLUDING:

- Former Cherokee principal chief Wilma Mankiller
- Oklahoma's First Lady Kim Henry
- Best-selling author Billie Letts
- Prima ballerina Maria Tallchief
- OU basketball coach Sherri Coale

Editors Carolyn Anne Taylor, Emily Dial-Driver, Carole Burrage, and Sally Emmons-Featherston, all ROGERS STATE UNIVERSITY professors, bring together the voices of a diverse group of Oklahoma women who represent the heart of us all.

For additional information please visit the website: www.voicesfromtheheartland.com

Available from online booksellers, bookstores, or www.oupres.com

UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA PRESS
2800 VENTURE DRIVE • NORMAN, OKLAHOMA 73069 • TEL 800 627 7377 • OUPRESS.COM